

Integrating Digital & Traditional Marketing Activities to Leverage Scarce Resources

Authored by Barbara Rentschler, CMO & SVP of Global Marketing at KNex Brands. The digital world is an exciting place, with possibilities that seem endless. It's fun to experiment with the new services and tools that are created daily. This is a phenomenon that constantly reinvents itself and provides endless opportunities for marketers. The challenge for marketers is that at the end of the day, we still need to convince consumers to purchase products. Creating engagement is fun but without conversion to a sale, it's pointless. Relying on only traditional marketing programs means you lose ground. But there are traditional tools that work, right? So why not combine the digital and traditional tools to create marketing programs that can reach a wide, but still targeted audience? We marketers adapt. One of the advantages of a small company is that there is a lot less bureaucracy than in many large companies. Our size means that everyone knows everyone else. Scarce resources drive creativity. As a result, our marketing team focuses on how to use digital tools to deliver consumer promotions, including those typically delivered with traditional tools. We don't differentiate between digital and traditional marketing programs; we just use them.
